UP, UP AND OVER THE CHANNEL

American cluster balloonist Jonathan Trappe is questioned by French police after landing near a cabbage patch in Moeres, France, on Friday after his record-setting trip.

Just before he reached the English Channel, Jonathan Trappe of Raleigh saw that he was about to fly over the White Cliffs of Dover, so he stabbed a couple of balloons and cut loose others. It was OK. There were a few dozen more in a pleasing mix of colors to keep him aloft.

Out hissed helium. Down he drifted, to within a few hundred feet of the chalk cliffs where he could enjoy the view from a few hundred feet, nothing between him and the scenery except sky.

Then Trappe dumped some water ballast and began climbing again as he headed for France and the odd place in history that he claimed Friday morning: first person to cross the English Channel dangling under a cluster of small balloons.

"It was so beautiful," he said by phone. "Sure, there's a sense of accomplishment, a sense of adventure, but it was also just beautiful, a beautiful sunny day of flying over these green fields, that really deep English green, and these little villages and old stone churches, the cliffs and the Channel, and just this silence."

State may cap UNC's growth

The House budget would hold enrollment to a 1% increase.

By ERIC FERRERI

A state House spending plan unveiled this week dares to consider an idea that North Carolina higher education leaders have opposed for years: limiting access to public universities.

Restricting growth to 1 percent across the 17 UNC campuses would likely mean no room for thousands of potential students. And it would be an unprecedented change for a university system that has long prided itself on its accessibility.

"Limiting access goes against everything we try to do within our university," said Hannah Gage, chairwoman of the UNC system's Board of Governors. "It looks like a big step backwards."

A special provision in the House's education spending plan would set the 1 percent enrollment growth limit in 2011-12. It would be a cumulative cap, so the UNC system would have to figure out how to balance growth among its individual campuses, officials said.

The measure, if enacted, could greatly decrease the number of new students. For example, UNC planners expect to add about 4,900 new students across the system this fall. If the system faced the 1 percent limit then, just 2,200 of them could enroll.

William Friday, the UNC president emeritus who spent 30 years running the system, said North Carolina has never considered enrollment limits and shouldn't start now.

"We put a very high premium on advanced work, and you don't get that by limiting ac-

Plumes may wreak havoc under water

By JUSTIN GILLIS
THE NEW YORK TIMES

IN THE GULF OF MEXICO – The ocean caught fire.

As it blazed, a dense column of black smoke rose toward the sky. Oily water, the color of strong tea, slopped up the sides of boats. The breeze carried an acrid smell, like gasoline fumes.

Aboard the research vessel F.G. Walton Smith, anxiety was growing.

Five scientists and six students had come to study the oil leak and its effect on the sea. They brought flasks and gloves, refrigerators and freezers, tiny tools and huge cylinders of gas.

They were not looking for oil on the surface, where it was so thick in places that it was being burned off, but for plumes of fine oil droplets far beneath the waves.

The stakes were high. Two weeks earlier, when some of these scientists had disclosed evidence of undersea plumes, the government greeted their claim skeptically. The scientists'

Trooper kills a kitten and loses his job

By MICHAEL BIESECKER

A state trooper who wanted to stop animals from climbing on his vehicles trapped his neighbor's 5-month-old kitten and shot it to death.

Former Trooper Shawn C. Houston was charged in October with cruelty to animals and injury to real property, both misdemeanors, according to court records. The Highway Patrol dismissed him in January.

Houston, 39, declined to discuss his firing this week. But in an appeal of his dismissal filed May 10, the former trooper contends that he was treated unfairly and that he deserves his job back.

Hospital will pick up tab for man who foiled kidnap

By MARK SCHULTZ

CHAPEL HILL – UNC Hospitals expects to pick up the bills for Joey Shelton, the Pittsboro man hit by a car trying to stop a kidnapping in Chapel Hill this month, a spokeswoman said.

Meanwhile, a fund at RBC Bank continues to receive donations daily from Boston, Atlanta, Washington, all over North Carolina and even the homeless shelter in Chapel Hill.

"The support has been unbelievable," said banking center manager Roger Badrock.

Shelton, a part-time barber and chauffeur, does not have health insurance. If UNC Health Care pays his tab, the fund can help Shelton with home care, medical supplies and missed work.

Last fiscal year UNC provided $266 million in uncompensated care, said Karen McCall, a health system vice president. "We're working with Mr. Shelton to get him financial aid, which we think he qualifies for," she said.

Shelton and his brother, Freddie, were driving May 12 when they saw a man dragging a jogger to a car.

Joey Shelton used his 1999 Cadillac Concours to block the man's car, and the brothers got out. The man let the woman go, got into his car and swerved around the Cadillac, spinning Joey Shelton onto the hood.

Shelton suffered fractured and compressed discs.

The suspect, Theodore James Walker, 26, is charged with second-degree kidnapping, assault on a female and assault with a deadly weapon inflicting serious injury.

Shelton said he's learning to trust "people who are showing their love."

"It's hard to believe," he said. "I'm really thrilled."
